State spotlight: Newborn Screening

Infants born in South Dakota receive blood spot screening and hearing screening prior to hospital discharge. The goal of newborn blood spot screening is to identify newborns at risk for life-threatening and debilitating conditions that would otherwise not be detected until damage has occurred, and for which intervention and/or treatment can improve the baby's outcome. South Dakota screens for 36 core conditions listed on the Recommended Uniform Screening Panel (RUSP) of the Secretary's Advisory Committee on Heritable Disorders in Newborns and Children. All infants whose newborn blood spot screening test results are outside of the normal limits for a newborn screening disorder receive follow-up to ensure prompt and appropriate follow-up testing. South Dakota Newborn Screening Program facilitates a Newborn Screening Advisory Committee comprised of pediatric specialists, laboratory personnel, nurses, pediatricians, families, and community members.
